Hi, Just to let you all know that I accompanied Nash Denic on an interview and tour of the lab (the Immunohistochemistry lab on Friday. The reporter is a CBC producer of radio documentaries. Nash did very well. He explained how things happen in the lab and actually had slides set up on a microscope for her to view with him at one lens and her at the other. She asked me a few questions, like "Do you have enough money"; "were you shocked about the lawsuit?"; "what do you think of the inquiry"; what are you doing now in preparation for the inquiry?". She really asked Nash a lot of questions about "turnover" and "lack of continuity" regarding pathologists. She also kept asking him about the need for national standards...to which he replied that this is in the works and would be of benefit, but difficult to implement. At the end, he asked her to please use her ability to get the message out that this is a test that is evolving and getting better, but we are not there yet and what we have done here has not been done anywhere else that he knows about. She did not commit to anything really, but answered "but what about all of those women I have talked to over the past few days?". So, this is the overview of what went on, God knows what this will sound like when she puts it together. Susan, can we find out when that will air? Pat
